Roles of forskolin in the induction of gamma-amino-butyric acid synthesis in the intact amygdala in vitro. The actions of forskolin on the release of gamma-aminobutyric acid (GABA) from the rat amygdala were examined. Forskolin (0.5 mM) enhanced the release of GABA measured by a microdialysis technique. Moreover, the release of GABA induced by iontophoretic applications of aspartate to the amygdala was potentiated by forskolin (0.5 mM) at low but not high aspartate concentrations. Forskolin (0.5 mM) also enhanced the GABA content of the amygdala tissue measured by the gamma-aminobutyric acid-specific electrode. However, aspartate (10 mM) failed to affect the GABA content of the tissue. These results suggest that forskolin may modulate the release of GABA from the amygdala by enhancing the release of aspartate.

Quantitative structure-activity relationship study on substituted diphenyl ether derivatives inhibitory to purified human intestinal maltase. A quantitative structure-activity relationship (QSAR) study was carried out on a series of substituted diphenyl ether derivatives as inhibitors of purified human intestinal maltase. Preliminary structure-activity relationships were determined using molecular modeling calculations. A partial least squares (PLS) regression model based on the molecular weights of the derivatives was derived using selected descriptors. This model was then validated using a threefold cross-validation procedure. The results indicate that molecular weight and the carbon number of the alkyl side chain, the net atomic charge at the phosphorus atom, and the polar surface area of the compounds contributed to the activity. The proposed model may provide a framework for the future design of a series of new maltase-inhibiting compounds./* -----
